Santa Catalina Island.

A Lawrence county boy, now a soldier in the United States Army and stationed on the Pacific coast, sends this interesting account of the beauties to be seen near Santa Catalina:

One of the most attractive spots in the vicinity of Los Angeles and one which draws large numbers of visitors is Santa Catalina Island, famed far and wide for its sub-marine gardens as well as for its own natural beauty. It is about 22 miles long and is situated in the Pacific ocean 27 miles from San Pedro, where steamer connection is made with electric cars from the city of Los Angeles. After a ride of about two hours upon the ocean the traveler is landed at Avalon, the picturesque little village upon the beach of Catalina.

The thing which first attracts the attention upon landing at the pier is the number of launches and row-boats which throng the waters of the bay soliciting passengers for the sub-marine gardens. These boats are built with bottoms of glass which afford a good view of aquatic life far below the surface of the water. Twenty-five cents is the price asked and the boatman names the fishes and the various marine plants as they appear before the eye, also announcing the depth of the water as the boat glides along.

And such wonders as are seen here are truly astonishing, and beautiful without. There are rocks entirely encrusted with shells which come within range of vision and again pass out of it. There are fishes of brilliant hue, red, green and golden, strange of name and of form, which float lazily along perfectly indifferent to the fact that curious eyes are staring at them from above. In and out they glide in this sub-marine garden through vegetation which sways gracefully hither and thither with the motion of the tide.

Again we see great waving branches like real trees, the product of the sea. This is kelp, a variety of sea-weed which here sometimes grows to a height of 200 feet. A strange provision of nature supplies this plant with ballast in the shape of hard balls which grow upon it in such a manner as to keep it from falling over. On the side from which the wind and tide sweep most freely these floating supports are found in greater numbers, thus serving to hold it erect.

So clear is the water that all this appears perfectly natural and is plainly discernible to the naked eye. People go into ecstasies over the beauties revealed in these gardens, which are really far below the surface of the water.

The next point of interest to the visitor at Catalina is Seal Rock, or Sea-Lion Rookery, three miles from Avalon. The steam launches carry passengers to this place, where hundreds of seals are seen frolic and playing on the beach and in the water.

Moonstone Beach is a place where great quantities of these semi-precious stones are found and tourists delight in roaming over the ground searching for specimens. Occasionally a stone is found which possesses considerable value.

Much interest for the average visitor to Catalina centers in the fishing, which is excelled by few points in the whole world, so it is claimed. The leaping tune, caught with hook and reel, sometimes weigh over 200 pounds. Indeed, one caught some years ago by a lady tipped the scales at 384 pounds. This fish can now be seen at the Los Angeles chamber of commerce, where it has been preserved.

Other kinds of fish found here are the yellow tail, black sea bass and the barracuda.

Back among the rocks of the island fine sport is afforded by hunting. In the 12,000 acres preserved for this purpose great numbers of wild goats are found which entice the huntsman over rocks and crags and through the canyons which abound in the mountains. There are also golflinks, said to be the finest on the coast, and a beautiful club house, while a number of hotels afford accommodation for the traveler.

Soon after the landing of the steamer a trolley - ho drawn by six horses pulls up in front of the main hotel and all those who desire to do so close to the edge of the bluff that it seems that the least misstep must result in disaster. It is related, however, that no accident of this character has ever happened on the island.

There is also a wireless telegraph station at one point on the mountain where messages are daily transmitted and received.

Taking it all in all Catalina Island is certainly filled with interest and no one visiting Los Angeles should fail to see it.
